Double major in Religious Studies and Philosophy

My interest in Scholastic Philosophy is heavily tied to Aquinas, Scotus, Lewis and other Christian apologetics. I took a few classes for fun and realized the most informed and best people to have conversations with about theology and philosophy were in the RST department, not the philosophy department. Davis' philosophy department is so focused on science and math that very few of the professors can engage in conversations about the more fun parts of philosophy like ontology, ethics, and metaphysics unless it is somehow tied to science or medicine. Figure out what the necessary classes are for your major, find out which ones are not offered more than once a year, and take those as soon as possible. You don't want to be a senior and find out that you are missing a class that is only offered in the fall by one professor and you are already half way through the fall. Do a major or double major if students are willing, and has the capacity, to read and abundant amount of material and retain it for papers and discussions. I continue to use my knowledge and the way my major changed the way I think and act in the world every day
